Suburbia. Bill. Owens

In 1972, while a news photographer for the Livermore Independent, Bill Owens made the photographs that comprise "Suburbia." Initially presented in this 1973 Straight Arrow volume, they have since been exhibited in museums and galleries in Europe and North America and become the classic photographic description of the American suburban dream. In an Art a Go Go interview, Owens explains that, "the photographs for Suburbia weren't done by accident. I put together a shooting script of events that I wanted to photograph ... Christmas, Thanksgiving, Fourth of July, Birthdays, et cetera. I got a small grant, and began taking photographs every Saturday for a year, so basically Suburbia was shot in 52 days." As opposed to other street photographers of the day, such as Garry Winogrand and Lee Friedlander who, in the tradition of Cartier-Bresson's and Robert Frank's politically charged "decisive moment," constructed their photography around formal visual juxtapositions and visual puns, Owens built his work around the intersection of a neutral journalistic stance and the dry, terse, deadpan commentary of the residents themselves. Where other photographic political critiques of the new America relied solely on visual epiphanies, Owens makes his case accessible, biting and explicit by grounding his visual information in the unambiguous starkness of the residents' commentary. It remains the classic examination of suburban life in 1970s California.
