Not illustrated. 1877 Excerpt: ...looked up in her uncle's face, but did not speak. "My pet, I shall have to teach you the meaning of the next petition in the Lord's Prayer." "The next. What is the next?" "Thy will be done." "I think I know what that means, Uncle Eden," said Maggie, wistfully. "Well, we shall see. But whose will are you wanting to do now?" Maggie studied. "I thought, Uncle Eden, I wanted to do what Jesus wants us to do--to help to do it, I mean." "And didn't you also want to do it in your own way?" Maggie did not answer. "Think about it," said Mr. Murray; "and in the meanwhile run out with Esther and see where you would like your garden ground to be, and how large a bit you think you can take care of; and when you have made up your mind, by-and-by I will come out and talk to you." Maggie ran away joyfully, and yet with a reserve of doubt in her own mind which was not agreeable. However, that was put aside for the present; and the delightful exploration and consultation with which she was charged quite took up all her care for the next hour or two. Esther was much struck and interested with the plan, and readily went out with Maggie to look for the piece of ground needed. The sun was shining brightly; the air was sweet and fresh too; the waves of the Sound glittered bright; the sunshine fell on ploughed fields about the house; a little further on rested on the scrubby wood which stretched along to a great distance and belted off the northerly winds. The two little girls stood still in front of the house. "Which way are you going?" "I don't know. I think it would be nice over there near the water." "It's sand, child." "Wouldn't sand make a good garden...
